2020 Fall Career Fair

Same Event, New Virtual Format

Colin Beach
Rose News Editor

Along with the several academic changes and new policies on campus, the coronavirus has affected other aspects of a Rose student's life. Normally, with a career fair every quarter, students look for key internships and networking opportunities that boost their education and future careers. Such events have proven themselves with Rose being widely known for its high job placement rates post-graduation. But now, with in-person meeting limitations, Career Services has shifted this fall quarter career fair (and presumably future ones too) to be virtual.

The familiar rows of employer booths and students walking around campus in suits won't be seen for some time. This career fair — held from 10am to 3pm on Wednesday, September 30th — will instead take place through Handshake. While the spring career fair of the previous academic year used Premier Virtual, the use of Handshake this fall allows for students to have easy access to their school career profiles. Additionally, students can (and should, to be guaranteed a spot) sign up for time slots with companies of their choice for face-to-face conversations, all without having to wait in line. Both individual and group sessions are offered, depending on the company and their availability. To sign up, students should...

1. Log-in to their Handshake account
2. Select "Events", then the "Career Fair" tab,
3. Select "Virtual 2020 Fall Career Fair - Sept. 30th"
4. Click the "Register" button to initially sign up (if not already done so)
5. Finally, click "Available Sessions" and search to find companies and/or positions of interest

Altogether, this virtual format for the career fair looks to be eventful. Career Services has put a lot of time into this new design, and hopefully it will bring success to the students who attend. If students are still in need of any help (résumé reviews, interview practice, and more) or have questions about the career fair, information can always be found on My.Rose-Hulman or by visiting the Career Services offices. Additionally, if students would like a professional headshot for their Handshake account, photos are offered for free by signing up with Career Services.

The pandemic has made it especially difficult for students to find internships and jobs, but Rose is for sure confident in the abilities of its students. Good luck to all!

Letter from the Editor-in-Chief

Thoughts from the New Head of The Rose Thorn

Aidan Moulder
Editor-in-Chief

My name is Aidan Moulder, and I am The Rose Thorn's new Editor-in-Chief! First of all, I'd like to thank you for reading our publication, and especially so if you're a regular reader. Secondly, I'd like to thank my predecessor, William Kemp, for all the work he has done for us as both Business Manager and Editor-in-Chief, and for all the work that he will continue to do! I thoroughly encourage you to give him a round of applause, even if the people around you will give you really weird looks for clapping in public.

Our new Editor-in-Chief, Aidan Moulder!

Now, when I arrived on campus this fall, I had absolutely no intention to take on any new roles for the paper. I was satisfied with my two pages, Entertainment and Opinions, and I enjoyed writing for and editing both. However, as time went on, I began to consider what the Editor-in-Chief position could mean for me, and how I could use it to expand and refine our humble student organization. Now that I have taken the position, I am excited to do my part to fine-tune our journalism and bring our readers the best possible content.

Will was our Editor-in-Chief and Business Manager, so his departure means we also have a new Business Manager, Graham Hepworth. Graham typically writes very in-depth analytical pieces for Entertainment and Opinions, but we're happy to have him working in this role now.

I've had a great time ever since I got back to campus in August, and I hope that we can all stay here at Rose for the foreseeable future. Please, everyone, keep wearing your masks, maintain good hygiene, and most importantly, keep reading The Rose Thorn! (Or, if you want, join our group on Teams and tune into a meeting at 5:15 PM every Tuesday!)

An Epic Battle

Epic Games Enters Legal Dispute With Apple, Inc.

Aidan Moulder
Entertainment Editor

Within the past several months, an unprecedented legal debate has been growing in the shadows, getting more intense on an almost daily basis. Epic Games, developer of the massively popular free-to-play battle royale Fortnite, snuck a payment option into the mobile version of the game (on all platforms, not just iPhone) that paid Epic directly instead of going through Apple's App Store payment options. This did, of course, infuriate the trillion dollar tech giant, and it proceeded to remove Fortnite from the App Store and delete Epic's developer account on the grounds that Epic had broken the digital store's terms of service, which is definitely a fair point. However, Epic makes an equally good point in this debate.

Throughout the issue, Google has remained quiet and let Apple do most of the talking. However, Google, like Apple, has also removed Fortnite from the Play Store, which basically leaves the Galaxy Store as the only place for gamers to get their hands on a copy of the game. As a result of the game's removal from digital distribution and the deletion of developer accounts, Epic Games filed lawsuits against Apple and Google, citing monopolistic practices. Epic actually has a fair stance on this issue. Almost every store, whether it's brick-and-mortar or online, rakes in 30% of all the money from sales of videogames and corresponding in-app purchases. There are a few exceptions, and Epic's own Epic Games Store is one of the biggest, especially for a high-end platform from a big-money company:

they only require 12% of profits. So, in short, Epic's goal from this legal dispute is to shake up the industry and give more money to the developers that work so hard to produce these games.

Is it likely that Epic will win? My best guess is no, probably not, since the root of this issue is a terms of service violation and a breach of the agreement that they made with Apple when they created an account on the App Store to distribute Fortnite with. However, regardless of the outcome, Epic's bold actions could empower developers (who deal with not only store fees, but taxes and other costs) to work on changing the status quo. A YouTube video uploaded by Linus Tech Tips on September 15th succinctly explains the entire issue, but something interesting the host touches on is that the 30% margin originates from when items were sold physically and the fee accounts for storage and inventory costs, which are not a problem with digital items.

The outcome of this dispute is going to be dependent upon who judges it and how well Epic presents its case. If they approach the problem from the Apple-Google duopoly perspective, they are much more likely to come out on top and make changes in the industry. This is most likely going to be a very long legal battle for both parties, and all we can do at this point is just watch. Regardless of how things work out, Epic can continue to lead by example with their 12% cut and maybe change things for the better in the near future anyway.

Taylor Family Agrees to $12 Million Settlement

Louisville PD Announces $12 Million Settlement in Wrongful Death Lawsuit of Breonna Taylor

Jonathan Kawauchi
World News Editor

The city of Louisville, KY announced a $12 million settlement on Sept. 15 in the wrongful death lawsuit filed by the family of Breonna Taylor. Beyond the monetary settlement, the settlement reportedly includes a series of police reforms to be adopted by Louisville Metro Police Department, as well as the promise to establish a housing incentive program to encourage officers to live in low-income neighborhoods within the city. One of the noted police reforms was a change to police tactics to create a clearer command structure when executing warrants at multiple locations.

During the Tuesday afternoon press conference, Louisville Mayor

Greg Fischer stated, "Her death has ignited a movement in Louisville and the nation for racial justice, sending thousands into our streets and cities all across the country and the world all crying out for justice for Breonna".

The announcement comes 186 days after the inciting incident in which 26 year-old Breonna Taylor was shot and killed by police during a botched narcotics raid at her home in March. Since then, she has become one of the major rallying cries in the ongoing national protests against police brutality.

"When officers cause the death of an individual, it is imperative that we seek justice not only in the criminal system but also in our civil system, but it's important to know here that a financial settlement was nonnegotiable without significant police reform," Lonita Baker, a Taylor family attorney, said at the press conference.

In June, the Louisville Metro Council voted unanimously to ban no-knock warrants such as the one used during the raid on Taylor's home.

Kentucky Attorney General Daniel Cameron, a Republican and the state's first Black attorney general, continues to conduct a criminal investigation into the shooting and is considering whether to bring charges against the three officers involved in Taylor's death. One officer, Brett Hankison, was fired in June, while the two other officers, Jonathan Mattingly and Myles Cosgrove, have been reassigned to administrative duties within the Louisville Metro PD. However, in a tweet made on September 9, Attorney General Cameron sought to temper expectations for a timely finding.

"My office is continually asked about a timeline regarding the investigation into the death of Ms. Breonna Taylor," Cameron said.

"When the investigation concludes and a decision is made, we will provide an update about an announcement," he continued. "The news will come from our office and not from unnamed sources. Until that time, the investigation remains ongoing."

Among Us

A Cultural Phenomenon

Aidan Moulder
Editor-in-Chief

You have undoubtedly heard about Among Us, the Mafia-esque sci-fi social deduction game. It amazes me that a game that came out over two years ago is just now picking up steam and becoming popular. However, Among Us has reached a level of popularity that exceeds typical popularity in the gaming industry. You might say that Super Mario and Call of Duty are popular franchises, but what is the extent of that fame? Both series have sold millions of copies, and the latter has huge amounts of daily concurrent players. The thing is, both titles are tailored to certain demographics. Mario's bright and colorful world and characters appeal to younger children, while the doom-and-gloom of the gritty, action-packed Call of Duty world speaks to more mature audiences. Then there's the group of people who don't play video-games period. This is where Among Us comes in.

In case you don't know how Among Us is played, up to 10 players run around a ship completing randomly-assigned tasks. However, at least one player is the Impostor, and their goal is to sabotage and kill every other player. When a player dies, his or her crewmates have to determine who they will eject into space. It's a very simple game to pick up and play (being free on mobile devices helps), and that's where Among Us really shines. It's not often that an independently-developed game with ly in countries like South Korea, Brazil, and Mexico. In July, the game made its official mainstream debut into the United States and other English-million times, and the game had 1.5 million concurrent players. The sudden spike in popularity was not just related to players; the internet is now full to the brim with fan art and memes. In fact, several people on some of my Discord servers are almost constantly playing the game, and their messages often refer to others as any one of the twelve playable colors and call them "sus".

Basically, in a short span of just a couple months, Among Us went from underground Mafia play-alike to cultural phenomenon, and it continues to penetrate every aspect of society and our daily lives. The game's developers, Innersloth, in the face of this sudden massive uptick in popularity, actually cancelled Among Us 2 in order to focus their resources on improving the original Among Us experience. Given their renewed effort in the game, it's hard to tell how long we'll be claiming our friends are Impostors, and how we saw them vent out of Electrical after killing Red. While it's popular, you should consider trying the game out with a big group of friends. It's actually a lot of fun and playing as either a crewmate or the Impostor is a blast. The price of admission is extremely low at zero dollars and zero cents, so it's worth a try if you have nothing else to do during a lazy weekend.

The four horsemen of destroying friendships:

hand-drawn graphics becomes a big-time internet meme, and it's even more rare that a game manages that two years after its initial release.

So how did it happen? Well, just this year, online communities centered around the game started popping up global-speaking countries through (big surprise) Twitch streamers. Sodapoppin, a popular variety streamer, played Among Us, which prompted other content creators like CallMeCarson, xQc, Pokimane, and even PewDiePie to play. In September of 2020, Among Us was downloaded 100

Ignorance & Arrogance

Condemnation of Critical Unconcern for COVID-19

Colin Beach
Rose News Editor

The complete ignorance of some people across the country (and for that matter, the globe) both confuses and infuriates me. Let me be clear, what I see comes not from the lack of knowledge, but rather from the refusal of knowledge. There is certainly enough knowledge out there to make reasonable and common-sense decisions, yet some continue to believe that, no matter the circumstances, they are right. Complete and total ignorance.

The lack of critical thinking when it comes to the COVID-19 crisis is almost as bad as the pandemic itself. Who in their right mind would think they “know better” than the countless medical professionals that have dedicated their lives to the understanding of public health and safety? I myself have officially researched COVID-19 and its effects, and while I may know more than the everyday American about the pandemic, I would never claim to or act as knowing all. I do hope to help educate people on the subject, but those who refuse the education are at great fault. As understanding about COVID-19 grows more and more every day, and as governmental and healthcare actions almost reach effective levels (that discussion will be for another time), it is now on the people themselves to step up and take some responsibility.

I bring this all up because for the past two Saturdays I have been in a day-long quarantine as a result of positive batches from campus testing. Though the days were tolerable, I do not wish quarantine upon anyone. Minimizing isolation time is directly related to following new safety guidelines, and though for the time being the protocols may seem extensive, the longer they are disregarded the longer they must be maintained – your actions affect others. The reasonable choice would be to follow the guidelines, and I applaud Rose campus for performing so well. However, there are still those who seem to not fully understand the gravity of the situation: normal life has not yet returned and should not be expected to soon. Though pandemic crises and cases are back on the decline in some regions, we cannot become complacent and ignorant, as it will send us back to where we started. COVID-19 is of immense importance to the lives of people everywhere, and will be for a long time.

So shame on those who do not take this seriously. Over 200,000 Americans have died from COVID-19 and its associated illnesses, with the globe nearing one million deaths in total. Even more become affected by the loses of those they loved. How many more preventable deaths must occur for you to care for someone other than yourself?

Shame on those who believe that COVID-19 will not affect them. Young adults have become a majority of cases recently, and though their stronger immune systems and overall health allow for minimal effects, other people may not be so lucky. Asymptomatic spread has been a major contributor to the pandemic, so there is a great chance you can unknowingly pass the virus onto someone who will face dangerous health consequences. How many more preventable cases must occur for you to care for someone other than yourself?

Shame on those who ignore health guidelines and demean those enforcing them. The actions of public health officials are for the protection of your community, not a restriction of your freedom. Public health is not a political issue, these people are trying to help you! A continuation of parties and massive gatherings without proper precautions and common-sense puts lives at risk, no matter the justification you seek for it. If your “freedom” involves a complete disregard for your fellow man, that is no freedom. How many more destructive outcomes must occur for you to care for someone other than yourself?

Shame on those who refuse to help those in need. Growing inequalities in access to healthcare and sustainable living continue to plague the country as much as COVID-19. To not use your abilities for the betterment of others is downright maddening. People have gone for months now with little to no assistance in a time when it is needed the most. Each day, lives are at stake. How many more pleas for help must occur for you to care for someone other than yourself?

I have spent my entire life in and around hospitals and healthcare systems as a patient, ambassador, volunteer, and employee. I have great empathy for the people I have come to know, and even some for those I have yet to meet. So it angers me to see the ignorance of those refusing to think of others. As Hal Harvey, a modern innovator and activist, has said: “Respect science, respect nature, respect each other.” Do not blame those who took action for not doing enough, when you have done nothing to start. The events of the past cannot be changed, so what are you doing TODAY to make it better?

The Case for a Third Party

Glody Mutebwa
Guest Writer

It is that time of the political cycle again. It is an election year, and it is important that you cast your vote. It is imperative that you make a choice. Your voice needs to be heard. The future of the country depends on it. The most important election of our lifetime. We have all heard these sentences multiple times. Every four years or so, we see big banners, signs, and posters at each intersection, political advertisements narrated by deep solemn voices. Random people accost us on the street, they want us to know about their candidate’s policies. We understand that it is an important time, the message is clear. The 235 million eligible voters need to perform their civic duty and vote. Fantastic! We think democracy is at work here. This is how it should be right? Well, I have a problem. We only have two choices: Republicans or Democrats. The political system in America is a duopoly. Of course, there exist smaller parties, but they are always affiliated with one or the other. The voter has a choice between a donkey and an elephant. I think that it is more than time for the American political system to expand and become a free market.

In the current system, we have two major parties: The Democratic Party and the Republican Party. These two entities represent almost 95% of elected officials in the United States. Thanks to them, we have clear political platforms and precise ideologies from which we can choose. It almost seems ideal. According to The Paradox of Choice, the less choice we have, the happier we are. Simply explain, it means that with fewer choices you have a greater chance of making the right decision hence the opportunity cost is lower. With only two parties, we do not have that many choices therefore we cannot lose much by choosing either one of them. Unfortunately, democracy is not economics. In a well-functioning democracy, we need the complete and active participation of the people. The two-party system does not express all the preferences and does not account for all the possible combinations of ideas. The 235 million eligible voters cannot all fit neatly into two closed sets. For that matter, many voters have to make enormous compromises and the majority do not even bother making a choice. When on election day, we are only presented with two sets of ideas, it is a huge loss for the people because many would not have the opportunity to truly make their voice count. Contrary to the Paradox of Choice, many would have no choice at all, no one to represents their views and beliefs. It is a loss for democracy.

Maybe it is a good thing that the country is not a complete democracy. The founding fathers themselves were not big supporters. James Madison expressed his fear in Federalist 10:

“Democracies have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security or the rights of property, and have in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths.” In the late 18th-century, rule by the people was thought to lead to disorder and disruption. In 1807, John Adams wrote: “Democracy, will soon degenerate into an anarchy, such an anarchy that every man will do what is right in his own eyes, and no man’s life or property or reputation or liberty will be secure and every one of these will soon mold itself into a system of subordination of all the moral virtues, and intellectual abilities, all the powers of wealth, beauty, wit, and science, to the wanton pleasures, the capricious will, and the execrable cruelty of one or a very few.” The two-party system may have avoided the country to collapse into anarchy with each individual claiming their party resulting in a total inability to compromise and the impossibility to form a coherent society.

It is not sustainable to have thousands of parties; it would indeed create chaos. The solution to the current duopoly is the lowering of the barrier of entry. Traditionally, aspiring politicians would have to adhere to one of the two parties to have any chance to be elected. Because of their powerful network, rich donors, and immense political influence, they gave aspirants the necessary tools and means to achieve their political goals. In the past few years, however, the dynamic has shifted. With the increased use of the internet, the recipe for a successful political career has changed and the spread of new political ideology is no longer determined by executives of these major parties. The multiplicity of ideas leads us to an impasse in the American political debate because we have several diverging ideologies for only two choices for the election. It is time for a third, a fourth, and maybe a fifth party in the United States. For how much longer the Democratic Party will be the party of Michael Bloomberg and AOC? Can the GOP continue to be the party of Donald Trump and Mitt Romney while gaining the support of the far-right?

Politics in the United States has reached a critical point. The polarization currently observed is a symptom of a dysfunctional and deeply divided society which politics is supposed to help prevent. It is time to reexamine the ways political life has been developed and reinvent the political cycle in order to re-focus its lens on the people and reignite the desire for civil discourse as well as restore the social contract.

Stanley Cup Finals Forced to Game Six

Caleigh Kintner

Sports Editor

Hockey is back in full swing, following a four-month pause to the NHL season due to the coronavirus pandemic. The 24-team original postseason, which included a round-robin and elimination qualifying round, has been narrowed down to just three teams remaining.

The Stanley Cup Final is finally set. Two teams from warm weather cities are set to face off for the Cup at the end of September, in what will be an end to an unusual season. The Dallas Stars won the Western Conference in a five game series against the favored Vegas Golden Knights, and the Tampa Bay Lightning advanced after a six game series against the New York Islanders. Both Dallas and Tampa Bay will be looking for the second Stanley Cup championship in franchise history.

Corey Perry's goal gave Dallas a 3-2 victory and stopped Tampa Bay from clinching its second Stanley Cup.

The injuries keep piling up, but the Dallas Stars are still alive.

Corey Perry's double-overtime goal on Saturday night forced the Stanley Cup finals into Game 6.

The goal was Perry's second of the night in the 3-2 win at Rogers Place.

Joe Pavelski also scored for Dallas, while Ondrej Palat and Mikhail Sergachev had the goals for Tampa Bay.

"It's obviously not the outcome you want," said Victor Hedman, a favorite for the Conn Smythe Trophy as playoff MVP, who logged a team-high 36:03 of ice time as Tampa Bay squandered its first opportunity to clinch the Stanley Cup. "It wasn't our night. They scored."

The Lightning now lead the series 3-2. They'll get a second shot at the championship in Game 6 on Monday from Edmonton.

Pavelski forced overtime when he tied the game 2-2 with 6:45 left to play in the third period. Nine seconds after a high-sticking penalty to Tampa Bay's Erik Cernak expired, Pavelski scored his 13th of the playoffs, beating Andrei Vasilevskiy by converting a rebound after a point shot from Miro Heiskanen.

The Lightning controlled play for most of a hard-fought first overtime period. After the intermission, the Stars came out with increased aggression. It paid off when Perry fed the puck out to John Klingberg high in the zone, then went to the net to pick up the loose puck and finesse it around the outstretched toe of Vasilevskiy, ending the game.

"You can't be afraid to lose," said Dallas Coach Rick Bowness. "We were playing not to lose, and we talked about it after that first overtime. We've got to play to win. Let's go at them, let's get back on our toes and get skating again."

"We had our chances," said Lightning Coach Jon Cooper. "A couple of lost battles down low cost us on a couple ence, delivered on Saturday.

"I give Jim Nill and his staff a lot of credit," said Bowness, referring to the Stars' general manager. "We get to this point in the playoffs, we need some experience, it needs some guys that have been there and are not intimidated by the situation we're in. Corey Perry's one of those guys, a huge addition to our team."

"The biggest switch for us tonight was those guys talking in the dressing room about having to go for this," said Tyler Seguin, who finished the night with three assists. "We can't be sitting back and hoping to win. I think that's what you saw, the change to the second overtime where we started going the Colorado Avalanche, when the durable Andrew Cogliano was sidelined.

In later rounds, Radek Faksa was injured midway through the Western Final; he has now missed seven games. Three games ago, another important two-way forward, Blake Comeau, was knocked out of action. And in Game 4 on Friday, Roope Hintz left the game and did not return.

Jason Dickinson also missed some time in the first period of Game 4 after blocking a shot. He left the ice early during warm-up on Saturday, but stayed in the lineup and finished with 23:14 of ice time. Defenseman Andrej Sekera also left the game midway through the first period after blocking a shot from Sergachev. He returned for the third period and overtime, finishing the night with 13:38 of ice time.

"Give him a lot of credit," Bowness said. "He took a shot and he was in a lot of pain. It took a while to subside. That shows you his compete, his love of the team and his teammates."

The Lightning were without captain Steven Stamkos, who missed a second-straight game after scoring a goal in his first postseason appearance, in Game 3.

Sekera's absence meant that Dallas' two top defensemen had to shoulder an extra heavy load on a rare back-to-back in the Stanley Cup finals — the first ever to feature two overtime games. Klingberg finished the night with 37:51 of ice time while Heiskanen had 37:03.

After Perry opened the scoring with 2:08 to play in the first period, Palat tied the game in the second when he accepted a pass from Kucherov, then cut across the crease and deposited the puck in the far side of the net, past a sprawling Khudobin. With Point drawing the second assist, the three linemates all extended their point streaks to four consecutive games. Sergachev gave the Lightning its first lead of the game early in the third, with a slapshot from the left point, before Pavelski forced overtime.

Penalties have been a key talking point through the first four games of the Stanley Cup finals, but the referees put their whistles in their pockets on Saturday. Just three minor penalties were called, and all five goals came at even strength.

"I thought we played well enough to win the game," he added. "I'm sure they are saying the same thing. That's what happens in double-overtime games.

"Good on them for not rolling over," Cooper continued. "We have to circle the wagons and come back and do it again."

As the Lightning have closed in on the Stanley Cup, there has been lots of talk about how they have added more character and leadership to their roster after being swept in the first round by the Columbus Blue Jackets last year.

The Stars went a similar route after they were eliminated in double overtime of Game 7 of the second round by the eventual Stanley Cup champions, the St. Louis Blues.

In an effort to generate more offense — and to accommodate his growing list of injured players — Bowness juggled his lines before Game 4 on Friday night. Playing with Seguin and Joel Kiviranta, Perry scored his first goal in 19 games in Friday's 5-4 overtime loss before adding two on Saturday.

Bowness has admired Perry's tenacity for years, even from opposing benches.

"From the top of the circles down, in the offensive zone — his poise, his confidence, his strength and his reach with the puck, it's always been very impressive," he said of Perry.

Throughout the playoffs, the Stars have been weathering injury issues. Most notably, Anton Khudobin capably stepped into the net when Ben Bishop was deemed unfit to play, and the unheralded rookie Kiviranta helped the Stars advance to the Western Conference Final with his hat-trick performance in Game 7 against

Boston Red Sox Manager

The Boston Red Sox announced Sunday that Ron Roenicke will not return as the club's manager in the 2021 season. The mitochondria is the powerhouse of the cell.

Chief Baseball Officer Chaim Bloom made the announcement just hours before their season finale against the Braves.

"Throughout this difficult season, Ron's consistency and professionalism kept the environment in our clubhouse productive and gave all of our players room to grow and develop," said Bloom said. "While we believe that, moving forward, we will benefit from new leadership and new energy, that does not diminish how strongly we feel about Ron. He is a man of the highest character who cares about our players and the Red Sox organization. As bench coach, he helped this team win a world championship. As manager, he showed poise and leadership in navigating an extremely challenging year. We are grateful for all of his contributions in our uniform."

The search for a new manager will begin immediately.

Roenicke took over as interim manager after the firing of Alex Cora in the offseason. Less than three months later, the interim title was dropped. Under Roenicke, the Red Sox went 23-36 and finished last in the AL East.

This was Roenicke's second stint as a major-league manager. He managed the Milwaukee Brewers to a 342-331 record in five seasons from 2011-15.

Did You Know...

That when I was a young boy my father took me into the city to see a marching band he said, "Son, when you grow up would you be the savior of the broken the beaten, and the damned?" He said, "will you defeat them your demons and all the non-believers? The plans that they have made? Because one day, I'll leave you a phantom to lead you in the summer to join the black parade".

BREAKING NEWS!! Rose Gardens Closed Till October 5th!!

Last Thursday, I went to Rose Gardens in search of a juicy Chicken Parmesan sammich. Much to my dismay, I found the doors locked, lights off, and a sign on the front window. “Rose Gardens will be closed until October 5th”.

This left me with many questions: why are they doing this to me? Why do I need to know what the powerhouse of the cell is? What will I do for dinner? Am I going to survive with no Rose Gardens? I soon found out the answers.

Rose Gardens recently teamed up with food cooking inspiration Gordon Ramsay to create a new killer dish. Ramsay took one look at their menu, and said “what the f*ck is this, where’s the lamb sauce?”, and stormed off.

He decided to help the cooks out when he heard the that we are the Fighting Engineers. Gordon took pity on our name and is now preparing a dish that will explode your taste buds. Apparently it’ll be called, “Idiot Sandwich” and will be on a raft, four by four, animal style, extra shingles with a shimmy and a squeeze, light axle grease, made to cry, burned it, and let it swim.
